

The Longest Game in Town

As Medicaid expansion goes into overtime, fans of closing the coverage gap must stay engaged.

If you left the 2015 Utah legislative session wondering, “What happened to Medicaid expansion?” you aren’t alone.

Many Utahns were shocked when the session ended on March 12 with no solution. Gov. Herbert’s Healthy Utah plan was defeated in a House committee, while competing plans were similarly neutralized. The 72,000 Utahns living in the coverage gap—and their equally numerous supporters—were left with nothing except hoarse lungs and elevated blood pressure. For a session that started with bold pledges to tackle big and transformative issues, the Medicaid expansion debate ended with a whimper and most post-mortems of the 2015 session labeled the whole process a failure in governance.

So is it even worthwhile to review what happened? We think yes, because the strongest arguments and the biggest misperceptions raised during the session still matter as the debate goes into overtime. But since a normal legislative recap is boring, we’ve re-imagined the 2015 legislative session as a playoff-style showdown between Healthy Utah and the field of coverage plans that rose to challenge it. The only caveat to this approach is that Utah’s Medicaid politics isn’t a game when your family’s well-being depends on the outcome--and we know thousands of Utahns waiting for this "game" to end.

How do we know the ACA is working?

At UHPP we've decided to ignore the political theater that surrounds the Affordable Care Act (ACA).

Instead, we've focused our energy on explaining how national health reform—including the ACA—is creating new coverage options here in Utah.

Take Care Utah to the rescue

Many of the people and organizations featured on KUTV's investigative series Get Gephardt would rather be anywhere else. But not Take Care Utah (TCU). In late March KUTV's Matt Gephardt profiled how TCU navigators help Utah families learn about their new health insurance options.

All that falls must converge

Utah's uninsured rate dropped 15% between 2013 and 2014. Is it a coincidence that tens of thousands of Utah families also signed up for ACA insurance, or not?
